The invention relates to a mat for sport and games for detecting impact position of a movable object such as a ball. The mat comprises an outer and an inner layer, each with inlays of electrically conductive elements forming a pressure-sensitive switch distributed over the target area. The pressure-sensitive switches communicate with electronic circuits for indicating, processing and presentation of electrical signals when the switches are activated by a ball impact. The invention further incorporates an insulation layer between the outer and inner layers, provided with cavities or holes from which one or more openings directed sideways are provided for air movement during said impact.

Document D1, which is considered to represent the most relevant state of the art, discloses a device for detecting the impact of a tennis ball. The device comprises outer and inner layers (1), on their mating sides provided with electrically conductive material (2) and between them an isolating layer

(3) to normally keep the switch open. According to the document, mats could be placed strategically, covering chosen areas of the tennis court (fig. 3).

The subject matter of claim 1 differs from the disclosure of D1 in that the insulating layer (5) between the outer and inner layers is provided with cavities at the position of the pressure sensitive switches and from each cavity at least one opening is directed sideways for air movement during impact or pressure activation.

The invention defined in claims 1- 11 is not disclosed by this document.

The cited prior art does not give any indication that would lead a person skilled in the art to the claimed device for use in sports and games for detecting the position of impact of a moveable object. Therefore, the claimed invention is not obvious to a person skilled in the art.

Accordingly, the invention defined in claims 1- 11 is novel and is considered to involve an inventive step.

The invention is industrially applicable.
